ABSTRACT

The bibliography presents information on 215 articles (1968-1982) concerning the effect of culture on the perception of handicapping conditions. Articles address the impact of the Mexican-American, Puerto Rican and Cuban cultural values on attitudinal barriers to employment. Articles were compiled by consulting the bibliographies of major reviews and from searches of eight databases (including National Rehabilitation Information Center, Medline, and Bilingual Education Bibliographic Abstracts) and organized into four topic areas: employer attitudes, family-relative attitudes, attitudes of the Hispanic handicapped, and rehabilitation service provider attitudes. Entries are alphabetized by author's name within each topic and include title, source, date, and pagination information. (Author/CL)

Pan American University

This bibliography is a compilation of articles which relate to the effect of culture on the perception of handicapping conditions. Articles of relevance to understanding the impact of the Mexican-American, Puerto Rican and Cuban cultural values on attitudinal barriers to productive employment were identified. The 215 articles were selected by consulting the bibliographies of major reviews and computer-assisted searches. On-line retrieval utilized the following data bases: National Institute of Mental Health, National Rehabilitation Information Center, Medline, Bilingual Education Bibliographic Abstracts, Family Resources Data Base, Health Planning and Administration, Dissertation Abstracts International, and Psychological Abstracts. The articles were selected and then grouped into the following areas: (1) Employer attitudes; (2) Family-relative attitudes; (3) Attitudes of the Hispanic handicapped; and, (4) Rehabilitation Service Provider attitudes. The studies and reports cited are alphabetized within each section for reader convenience. The information provided here is intended to (1) serve as a data base for research in this area through the identification of numerous knowledge gaps; and, (2) provide a general understanding of the impact of culture on attitudes toward the handicapped.
